

2024 looks to be one of the most significant years in our lifetime. Are we ready for it?

Thoughts on 2024

Even though God's new year doesn't start for another few months (on April 8th this year), there is a benefit from assessing the last calendar year and planning and being hopeful about the upcoming 2024 year in front of us. With all the things going on: wars and rumors of wars; monumental technological and ideological shifts as well as another national election, this new year promises to be significant.

So what would God want us to know and focus on for this coming year? While I was on a family vacation this past week, I had a couple of people ask me what I thought that Christians should be doing in the present season. The basic skinny is that we need a greater transformative relationship with God and each other in smaller type of under-the-radar settings; that we need to pray for a coming revival while recognizing that we will not be overwhelmingly triumphant in national or larger spheres until Yeshua returns; and that instead, we need to be more prepared to suffer for our identification with Him--especially as we stand with His priorities and the Jewish people. Tomorrow I'll share more of what is on my heart in this present season.
